Most of the fallen civilizations are succeeded by the Dark Ages and it has taken double the time for man to return to the heights touched by the civilization before them. After the fall of the civilization, Greece fell into the Dark Ages and it was centuries before Greece returned to its former glory.

Some, as we already know, met their end at the hands of natural disasters, like the people of Pompeii, who were buried under a layer of ash and pumice, from the eruption of Mount Vesuvius.

But, some, like the Harappan civilization, disappeared without a trace, until they were rediscovered by archaeologists' centuries later and we still have no clue what happened to them!

Did they try to fight the odds and go down fighting and kicking? Or did they just resign to fate and simply give up? It is extremely intriguing, how these civilizations built up over centuries, disappear over a short period of time and most of the time wipe the slate clean of all progress they had reached, leaving their successors to begin at square one.
